Dear Members and Friends,

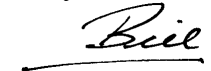

Some of you asked for the poem, which I quoted in Sunday's sermon, by Molly Jevne Pennock, of Minneapolis days. Here it is for your enjoyment:

In having touched the coarse, hallowed cheek of death, I know the fine, porcelain feel of life.
I have come to recognize the carefully seasoned taste of human frailty.
of man's impermanence
of life's uncertainty, for my palate
has become more discerning.
I am aware that the smell of freshly fallen snow can be every bit as fragrant as the scent of a rose petal, every bit as pungent as a field of wild poppies.
Where once I was bereft of light I am sighted to the flickering flame of the omnipotent glow. that can penetrate
even the darkest nights.
And so acutely tuned
is my hearing,
that I have captured the rhapsody of the caged Nightingale and I understand now why it is, he sings.

The revelation of one's mortality comes in realizing that you can borrow Life, but never own it.
So celebrate the days new dawning by savoring each moment for they are fleeting and few.
Exalt in your existence for its value is immeasurable, and let Life's exhilaration repeatedly overwhelm you.

—Molly Jevne Pennock

See you in church,

William B. Rolland
